

1. Many readers of Something Borrowed expressed doubts at being able to read and enjoy a book from Darcy's point of view. Were you reluctant to read her story? Did your feelings about her ever change? If so, at what point in the story?
2. What do you view as Darcy's greatest weakness? Could this also be considered her greatest strength? If so, how?
3. What do you think caused Darcy's breakup with Marcus? Do you think Marcus was more or less responsible for it than Darcy?
4. In many ways this is a story about personal growth and transformation. Do you think people can fundamentally change? How difficult did it seem for Darcy to change? What role did Ethan play in those changes? What role did her pregnancy play?
5. What do you think would have become of Darcy if she had not become pregnant? If she hadn't gone to London? What are some of the key differences in living life in London as opposed to New York? Do you think some of these differences helped Darcy evolve?
6. How do you think Darcy's relationship with her mother played a role in the person she was?
7. In what ways are Dex, Marcus, and Ethan different? In what ways are they similar? Do you think their similarities are true of men in general?
8. Where do you see Darcy and Rachel in five years? Ten? If you were Darcy, would you have been able to forgive Rachel? Would you have invited her to your wedding?
9. Do you feel there is a line that can be crossed in friendship, where forgiveness isn't possible?
10. What are your views regarding the closing sentences of the book: "Love and friendship. They are what make us who we are, and what can change us, if we let them."?
